From the beginning of the 20th century, the landscape architecture of André Le Notre (1613-1700), the famed designer whose 400th birthday we celebrate this year, has constantly inspired an inventive interplay between design practices, theories, and critique. Informed by innumerable cultural exchanges between different disciplines and historic eras, this interplay entails conceptual and technological mutations of an open-ended landscape type, an adaptive scheme that evolves according to place and time.

The lecture will touch upon few expressions of such exchanges, including design projects and texts, looking first at gardens from Cubism to Minimalism, then at urban landscapes from the Mall in Washington (1901-1902) to Axe Majeur, west of Paris (1980-2006). It will show how Le Notre and Versailles remain key markers in the broader interaction between past, present and future that defines and renews modernity in the West.
